

Thank you for the opportunity to comment on the growing telemarketing problem. I do not feel that telemarketers should have any rights that supersede the rights of the public whom they are calling. The rules should provide for a single national database to which individuals can have their phone numbers added, preferably via the Internet. That reporting process should be simple and easy. Telemarketers should be required to insure that they never call these numbers under severe penalty of law. The public should also be able to report violations when telemarketers call in spite of the individual's number(s) being in this database, preferably via the Internet. That reporting process should be simple and easy. The database entries should be permanent unless the individual decides to remove his number(s) from it. In the unlikely event that the individual should decide to remove his number(s), the process should be simple and easy, preferably via the Internet. There should also be a process whereby individuals who have elected not to have their phone number(s) in the database can report calls from telemarketers received during hours (weekends, etc.) when they are prohibited from calling, preferably via the Internet. That reporting process should be simple and easy. Telemarketers must be stopped from calling individuals who do not wish to be called and who have indicated that preference by having their phone number(s) entered in a national database.
